Report description:

Retail volume sales of computers and peripherals saw a decline in 2023, continuing the trend of the previous two years. Growth was hindered by the high rate of inflation, at least during the first half of 2023, which continued to bite into discretionary consumer spending. While the rate of inflation eased during the second part of the year, demand for such products remained muted, as many consumers had already upgraded their devices at the height of the pandemic and therefore had no need to buy...
